Note on Subsequent Oral Reports Date

The 2018 data for Subsequent Oral Reports follows a broader definition that cannot be replicated for earlier data. The result is an increase that largely reflects the change in definition. The change was made to provide for information about children, but it distorts the comparison with prior years.

When a family is first reported to DCFS, a case is opened with a sequential number starting with “A.” If an investigation is “indicated” – meaning an investigator finds enough evidence to substantiate abuse or neglect – a subsequent case will receive a number starting with “B.” If that “B” case is substantiated, the next subsequent case will receive a “C” number, and so forth. When an investigator opens a new case for that family, a letter other than “A” provides a clear sign that this family has history with DCFS. It’s a quick and important signal for the investigator.

Some investigations are “unfounded,” meaning an investigator did not find enough evidence to substantiate abuse or neglect. In the past, such a finding meant that the sequential numbering system did not move forward. So a family’s first unfounded “A” case could be followed by a second “A” case, and perhaps a third. An investigator opening a new case had no quick way of knowing the family has a history with DCFS. While the past “unfounded” case is not evidence in a new case, that history is critical information for an investigator. It is sign of continuing problems in a family.

Now, every new case associated with the same family moves the lettering sequence forward, even unfounded ones. As a result of the new lettering sequence, the 2018 data shows a larger number of cases. Because old sequence numbers do not change, cases in past years are counted under the old numbering method.
